

Question A

Would you ever consider living permanent in a country other than yours ? Why or why not ?

People often say that travel broadens the mind but I wonder if this is always a positive move when you leave your country to live permanently in a foreign country.

There are many reasons why someone can migrate to a foreign country. You have many refugees. You have political and economical refugees. They are forced to migrate because they cannot express freely their political ideas and are threatened to death. This is also the case for economic refugees who migrate because they hope to find a better living for them and their families. For example, you have millions of mexicans or Latin-American refugees who are trying to cross the US barrier every year.

You also have the case of some people who may follow their lover To another country. Anyway, people leave the country just because they have an interest which may be emotional, political or economic.

As To me, I am not ready to go and live permanently to another country. However, I am not opposed to the idea of living for some time in a foreign country. After a certain period of time, I Will be able to weigh the pros and cons and really make a decision. I like English- speaking countries of the West. Indies because I find that the people are nice and welcoming but these are my first impressions. I don't know if after a longer period of time they will consider me as a foreigner who comes To steal their jobs.
